colliding Shockwaves of any sort can create a singularity and warp space time

<http://www.news.ucdavis.edu/search/n...lasso?id=10275>

A shockwave creates an abrupt change, or discontinuity, in the pressure and density of a fluid, and this creates a jump in the curvature. But it has been known since the 1960s that the jump in curvature created by a single shock wave is not enough to rule out the locally flat nature of space-time.

Vogler's doctoral work used mathematics to simulate two shockwaves colliding, while Reintjes followed up with an analysis of the equations that describe what happens when shockwaves cross. He found this created a new type of singularity, which he dubbed a "regularity singularity."

What is surprising is that something as mild as interacting waves could create something as extreme as a space-time singularity, Temple said.

so warping space can be as easy as surround sound :P

and incidently this makes three known artificial ways to control the curvature of space time artificially.

you have this...

and laser induced frame dragging and the boundary conditions or vacuum flux between two narrowly spaced boundaries.

looks like Star Trek might be real after all 😊 and is it just me or is it that scientists are keeping quiet on the fact that they knew about ways to do stuff like this at the same time they were poo pooing space warps as fantastical kooksville?

well i think it may make exploring the mechanics of "warping" space more accessible than it would otherwise be. i think you should be able to rig macroscopic experiments in the lab. before hand you had to either look at quantum or particle level effects or at distant high gravity objects.
